Not illustrated. 1902 Excerpt: .and these pictures were very carefully taken for future reference in the matter of the vertical lines. The enlargements which are exhibited in the Brooklvn Institute Museum have great value in this matter and the true perpendiculars are established for two of them with absolute certainty (Figs. 26, 30). It is with reference to the aisles that we now again draw attention to the fact that a very insignificant amount of the widening in the nave is obtained in the piers, between the pavement and the capital moulding. For the first three piers of the nave, on each side, the amount of leaning on the side of the aisles is as follows, in the direction from facade to transept: Right: .12, .12: .00.03;.10, .12 (Plan 4). Left: .20, .20;.06, .12: .24.20 (Plan 5). Whereas some of these amounts are insignificant, and would hardly be considered, were it not for the proven intention of the widening higher up in the nave, it will appear that the engaged columns of the aisle walls lean outward in much greater degree (Plans 4, 5). These engaged columns of the aisles determine the dominant vertical effect of the walls, on account of their strong projection and massive size (Figs. 26, 30). The piers which continue the lines of the aisles across the transepts are also so placed as to line with these columns, as distinguished from the walls of the nave, and the pilasters of the transept walls at the...
